† مایه marwi (fem. مایه) Any copy of verses, of which every distich ends in مایه.

† ماه mah † The moon. † A month. The ancient Persians did not measure the subdivisions of their month by weeks, but gave a particular name to every day in the month, as well as to every month in the year, which they adopted from certain angels, supposed to preside over, and to influence all the actions of those periods committed by Omnipotence to their care. Those angels were divided into two classes; the presidents of the months being considered as superior to the rulers of the days, whom they called کارکنان (i. e. ministers or subordinates). To each of the archangels, however, they assigned one day in his particular month, which was believed to be peculiarly favoured by him, and was therefore distinguished by a more than common attention. A distinct زمزمه zemzemé, or prayer, was appropriated to every angel; and it was considered as a circumstance of high disrespect, to mutter the zemzemé of one angel on a day patronized by another. The kings of Persia, in obedience to this belief, used a new talisman (or charm) every day, on which something was engraved relative to the superintending angel; they had a new and peculiar dish every day at table, and every day wore a new garment. To conciliate the favour of those Beings, was viewed as an object of the highest importance, and a number of festivals, were in consequence established, which had both a religious and a political tendency; the days supposed to be under the protection of the angels of the month being, in general, most particularly honoured. The first month of the Persian year commenced, from high antiquity, at the vernal equinox, and was formerly named ازور Azur or ادور Adur (i. e. Fire, or the angel imagined to preside over it); but when the sultan Jellaleddin reformed the Persian calendar about the end of the eleventh century, the order of the months was changed; since which time they have preserved the following order. See سال

I. فروردین Fervardin (March) so named from an angel whom they supposed to be the خازن Khazin, or treasurer of Paradise, and to have the particular care of the souls of the blessed. On the first of this month, called Nauruz, or New (Year's) Day, began the principal festival among the Persians, which continued for six days. On the first, the king gave his chief attention to promote the happiness of the body of the people; on the second, he entertained the doctors and astrologers; on the third, the priests and counsellors of state; on the fourth, the princes of the blood and grandees; on the fifth, the royal children; and on the sixth, which was considered as the king's particular day, his subjects made him free gifts agreeable to their rank. On the eve of the Nauruz, a young man of an elegant figure, personating the New Year, was stationed at the door of the royal bed-chamber, which he entered, without ceremony, the moment the sun appeared above the horizon. The king immediately addressing him, said, "What art thou? Whence dost thou come? Whither dost thou go? What is thy name? Wherefore dost thou approach? And what dost thou bring?" To which he answered, "I am the Fortunate and the Blessed; I am sent hither by God, and bring with me the New Year:" then sitting down, another appeared with a large silver dish, in which were wheat, barley, pease, vetches, sesamé, and rice (seven ears and nine grains of each), with a lump of sugar, and two new-coined pieces of gold, which, as an offering, was placed before the king. Then entered the prime minister, the general of the forces, the lord high treasurer, and the superintendant of war; after whom followed the nobles and people, according to their dignity and respective classes. A large loaf, made of the above-mentioned grains, being then presented to the king; after eating part of it, he offered some to those who were around him, saying, "This is the new day, of the new month, of the new year, of new time; when all things consistent with time must be renewed." Then investing his nobles with rich robes, he blessed and distributed amongst them the presents which had been brought.—The origin of this solemnity is carried up to one of their ancient kings, called Gemshid, who then made his first publick entry into Esfachar (Persépolis), which he had just finished; and, amongst other regulations, ordered, that the Persian era should commence from that day. (See سال). As various other ceremonies peculiar to this season will be found under the months Aban and Ispendarmuz, I shall only further observe here, that the 19th, being this angel's peculiar day, was likewise celebrated as a festival; during which, it was reckoned fortunate to shape, or put on new garments, and to take a general survey of the state of herds and flocks throughout the kingdom.

II. اردیبهشت Ardebehsht (April). This angel was supposed to have the charge of the keys of Paradise, with the superintendancy of mountains, and also of the sacred fire. On the third, which was the angel's name day, it was thought auspicious to give battle, to go to the Atish-khané (temple of fire), and to approach the king, under the idea, that all petitions then put up to their heavenly or earthly sovereign would be favourably heard. It may here, in general, be observed, that there is sometimes a discrepancy in the offices assigned to those subordinate deities, which arose probably from a variation in the customs and opinions of the different countries dependant on the Persian empire.

III. خرداد Khurdad (May). Under this angel's care were placed all seas, rivers, and waters of every kind; together with trees, and herbage.

On the sixth, being the angel's day, it was held fortunate to marry, and to offer up prayers to God and the angels for relief from all distress, and for the supply of every want. The twentieth was also solemnized in commemoration of a great victory said to have been gained over the usurper Zobak. See فریدون and کاوه.

IV. تیر Tir (June). This angel was considered as subordinate to Khurdad, the guardianship of cattle being assigned as his peculiar province. The thirteenth was solemnized by the festival called abrizgan, during which, all sorts of people sprinkled one another with water; the higher rank using water of roses, orange flowers, and other fragrant plants. This day was likewise distinguished on account of an old traditional treaty of peace, concluded between their king Manu-cheher, grandson of Feridun, and the Tartar or Scythian invader Afrasiab; when it was agreed to determine the limits of their dominions, by one shot of a famous Persian archer, called Arash, whose arrow piercing the bank of the Amou, or Oxus, that great river became thenceforth the general boundary of those hostile empires. The ceremony of sprinkling with water, it may be observed, was not confined to this festival, as it not only made part of the entertainments of the Namruz and Mihrgan, but was also customary on the 30th days of Khurdad and Behman, especially at Ispahan.

V. مرداد Murdad (July). This angel was one of the reputed guardians of trees, herbs, fruits, and seeds. On his day, which was the seventeenth, was held the solemnity called chesbni niluphar (the feast of Nenuphar), from the use made of that herb in their ceremonies: on which occasion, all petitions presented to the king and great men were favourably received, and, in general, granted. Murdad implies death giving; he was therefore considered as the angel of death, being often named also ferishte merg.

VI. شهریور Shebriyur (August). This angel had the custody assigned to him of all metals and minerals. Nothing remarkable distinguished his festival, which was on the fourth day; nor another, which was held on the 18th, the last being an autumnal feast, called خران.

VII. مهر Mibr (September). This angel was supposed to be the intelligence which regulated the sun, and to preside over love and friendship. He was also imagined to be the numbering angel, and the distributor of rewards and punishments on the last day; when they imagined he would sit as judge on a bridge, over which the departed spirits must pass, whilst the merits and iniquities of mankind were weighed in a pair of great scales by another angel, called Surush. If the good actions made the scale preponderate in the estimation of a hair, a passage, they thought, would then be opened to Paradise; if not, they would be consigned to the infernal regions, where they supposed seven gradations of torment, to correspond with seven degrees of felicity in heaven. Mahomet appears to have improved upon this system, by adding one degree more to celestial happiness. On the 16th, being this angel's particular day, began one of their greatest festivals, called مهرگان mihrgan. Many traditional motives are assigned for the origin of this solemnity, which was held for six days; but the most rational conjecture leads us to conclude, that it was instituted at this season of the autumnal equinox, in honour of their great ostensible deity, the Sun; as the other high festival of the Nauruz was, on the same principles, intended to celebrate the Sun's entering the constellation Aries. The sixteenth was more particularly distinguished than the rest; all who could afford the purchase, anointing themselves then with the oil of Ban, sprinkling themselves with rose water, and eating of various fruits, from an idea that such observations would defend them from a number evils which might otherwise distress them in the course of the year. The king, on the first day of this festival, after anointing himself with the oil of Ban, dressed in a superb robe of many colours, his head adorned with the royal تاج taj (diadem) on which was a splendid figure of the sun, seated himself on his throne; when the high priest entering alone with a large silver dish, filled with sugar, peaches, quinces, apples, citrons, pomegranates, the jujube, the lote, a bunch of white grapes, and seven myrtle berries, muttered over them a prayer, and presented them to the king, who eat of them all; after which, the nobility and others approaching according to their rank, followed their sovereign's example; when a variety of robes and other rich furniture, from the royal wardrobes, were distributed amongst them in proportion to their degree. — On this day it was esteemed fortunate to wean or name children; and if a son was then born to the king, he was immediately, with great solemnity, consecrated high priest of the Sun.

VIII. ابان Aban (October). This angel was reckoned subordinate to Kburdad, and to preside over iron. The tenth being his name day, was distinguished also as the anniversary of the expulsion of Afrasiab, king of Tartary or Turan, who had held Persia in subjection for twelve years (see افراسياب); and also for a great rain which, by tradition, fell on this day, after a seven years drought and famine. This month, in old times, having been the last of the year, they annexed to it the five supplementary days (see سال). On this occasion, they held a continued festival for eleven days, which began on the 26th, included those days, and ended on the first of the subsequent month Azur. During this solemnity, amongst other ceremonies, the Magi used to place upon the tops of high towers various kinds of rich viands, upon which it was supposed the Peris (fairies) and the spirits of their departed heroes regaled themselves; whilst the priests danced a solemn choral dance, called دستبند dustbend (joined hands) or پنجه penje (five), from the five emblematical days perhaps which gave rise to the festival. All ranks of people gave way at this season to the most unrestrained demonstrations of joy; they wore their best clothes, they entertained one another with the most unreserved hospitality; the rich sent small presents to the poor, called داشن dashin; whilst the king, with his nobles, assisted at all the amusements of the common people, decorated with the wreathes of flowers called بيسال besak, and the collars of pearls named پركر purger. The mornings were always ushered in by processions to the آتشگاه Atishgab (temple of fire), and it was not till after prayers were over that the diversions began, which consisted chiefly in a species of comedy, in fingers, instrumental musicians, and the swing, or see-saw, a favourite pastime in the East, as promoting a circulation of air extremely refreshing in those sultry climates. The hire paid to the سازنده sazende (comedian) was called پارنج parenj (feet labour); whence it may be concluded, that dancing and extravagant gesticulation formed the principal part of their theatrical exhibitions.

IX. اذر Adur or ازور Azur (November). This angel presided over fire; in consequence of which, on the ninth, his name day, the country blazed all around with flaming piles; whilst the Magi, by the injunction of Zoroaster, visited, with great solemnity, all the temples of that element throughout the empire, which, upon this occasion, were adorned and illuminated in a splendid manner. On this day it was reckoned a point of religion to pare the nails and to shave the hair, under the idea that, with these excrescences, they threw away, at the same time, all their sins and defects.

X. دي Dei (December). This angel presided not only over this month, but also over all the days beginning with Dei; as Dei ba Azur, Dei ba Mihr, &c. On 11th, or the angel's day, another great festival of fire was celebrated all over the kingdom; for the origin of which solemnity, a variety of traditional reasons have been handed down; one of them is curious: Winter, they say, having once, on the anniversary of that day, taken a fancy to come from hell, which was, it seems, too hot for him, their ancestors had lighted up immediately those piles of fire, to convince him, that he had got into a still more infernal place, and force him again from earth to the shades of darkness.—In order to improve the general scene of nocturnal splendor, on this occasion, it was usual for the king and his courtiers to set fire to large bunches of dry herbs, fastened to wild beasts and birds, who being then let loose, the fields, mountains, and the air itself were immediately in one universal temporary blaze, heightened often by the accidental firing of the neighbouring woods, to which those terrified animals naturally fled for shelter. Some Eastern antiquaries, who seem equally fertile in conjecture with those of Europe, trace this solemnity near 4000 years back, to the marriage of the hundred sons and daughters of their first king Caiumaras (the supposed king of Elam in scripture); whilst others again imagine it to be a commemorative of the destruction of a dreadful dragon by his grandson Husheng (see ۵۷۵); but the idea, founded in common sense, seems to rest on that general joy which people have in all times and countries expressed, when the sun having got to the tropick of Capricorn, the days from that period begin to lengthen; and as fire in this severe season is a most cheering element, their satisfaction could not be more naturally expressed than by flaming piles, which dispelled those gloomy ideas and chilling sensations produced by darkness and extreme cold. A custom similar to this prevailed even in England within this century; it having been customary, on Twelfth night, in Shropshire and other places, to kindle bonfires on the mountain tops and other high grounds, as a farewell to winter, and a welcome to the spring. The 15th of this month was remarkable for another singular ceremony: They formed a number of images of paste or clay, representing those deceased personages whom they meant to honour, which they placed in the most public places, especially where many roads or streets met, and, after paying them great homage, burnt them with much formality. — The eating of an apple on this morning, before speaking, the smelling to a narcissus, or the fumigation of the root of the iris, they supposed to be the best of all possible methods to secure uninterrupted tranquillity, and to banish indigence and hunger for twelve months. On the 24th they celebrated also the feast of garlic, which being dressed in a particular manner with meat and herbs, they supposed to be a charm of defence against the attacks of the Dives or demons; whom they also conjured out of places, they were imagined to haunt, by certain compositions, which they thought had a most powerful efficacy when prepared at this season.

XI. Behmen (January). This angel was considered in a light superior to all the rest; being supposed to have had the chief superintendence of every created thing, man excepted, who was the peculiar charge of Ormuzd, or Omnipotence: he was also the pacifier of rage, and the mediator in all quarrels. On the second or angel's day they celebrated the festival of corn and meat, which they boiled together, with white and red Behmen; sprinkling the dish, when served up, with those herbs and pounded sugar-candy. The white Behmen they also bruised amongst milk, and drank it as a strengthener of the memory. On this day it was judged fortunate to lay the foundations of houses; to shape, make, or put on new clothes; to pare the nails and shave the hair; to search for medicinal herbs and roots, in order to extract their perfumes, essences, and oils, for the composition of drugs and spells, which they imagined to have a virtue much superior to such as were prepared on any other day.

XII. Spendarmuz (February). To this angel they assigned the care of the earthly globe, and also the guardianship of virtuous women; in consequence of which the fifth, his peculiar day, was considered as highly auspicious to every circumstance relative to marriage. One of the names of this day was مردگیران merd giran (taking or governing men) founded, as they say, upon a custom which prevailed in ancient times of vesting the ladies upon that day with despotick power; the husbands paying an implicit obedience to the most arbitrary commands of their wives; whilst the virgins, in their respective classes, had the singular privilege of chusing for themselves a husband from among the unmarried part of the male sex; who, they say, had too high a respect for this gallant institution to hesitate a moment in receiving their fair admirers. — The pairing of the birds about this season might possibly have suggested those inducements to matrimony, as well to the West as to the East, Valentine's day, in old times, with some variation of ceremony, bearing a strong resemblance to this Persian festival. See سپندارمزد

It may be proper to observe, that the order of the months here followed is that which has prevailed in Persia since the reformation of the calendar by the Sultan Jellaleddin, who, it is supposed, restored the most ancient mode, as originally established by Gemshid (see ۵۷۵). In the middle ages of Persia, however, their position was different; Azur, which now corresponds with November, answering then to March, Dei to April, and so in rotation, the consecutive order being the same in both. This however has produced some disagreement amongst the writers, with regard to the attributes of the angels, and the origin of the various festivals; the Pharhang Jebanguiri, the Mujezat, Shab Colji, with other Persian and Arabian authors, differing from one another in some unsequential points, which it is of no importance to reconcile. The above outlines will be found in general just, and answer sufficiently the purpose for which they are introduced; that of explaining popular beliefs, and giving an idea of various customs and traditions, to which allusions are so often made in Eastern history, poetry and romance.

Murdad, for example, amongst other attributes, is supposed to be the presiding angel of winter; but that must apparently have been when his month (now July) corresponded with November, for the same reason the ridiculous parade of کوب Rakoub (the procession of Koufa) mentioned to have been celebrated in the month Azur, must apply to it, when coinciding with the vernal equinox. This festival, however whimsical it may appear to us, was solemnized in Persia by all ranks, from the prince to the peasant. An old toothless, beardless figure, representing Winter on his departure, was mounted on a mule or afs. He was generally some poor buffoon (if one eyed so much the better), who by ludicrous gesticulations afforded much mirth to the people; some sprinkling him with warm water and giving him hot victuals, whilst others were drenching him with cold; Koufa all the while fanning himself, and exclaiming Gurma gurma O heat! heat! He had a crow in one hand, and a fan or scourge in the other, and was attended even by the family of the king, or of the governor of the city, who accompanied him on horseback thro' the whole of the fantastick ceremony. In this manner he paraded the streets, entering the house of every nobleman, who was obliged to give him a piece of money if he did not wish to have his clothes bedawbed with a kind of red clay, which, dissolved with water, he carried by his side in a little earthen vessel. He then went into every shop, the owners of which took especial care to have their money ready, for a moment's delay gave Koufa a right to seize all that was in them. Whatever was thus collected before the first prayers became the property of the king, if in the metropolis, or of the governor in any other city; but from that hour till the second prayers the receipts were reserved by Koufa himself, who then suddenly disappeared; for if this representative of Winter was found in publick after that time, any person might beat him with impunity.

On the same grounds we must place in the month of April, another festival of a more dignified nature, which they celebrated anciently on the 8th of the month of Dei, called Khurm ruz (Cheerful day); when, according to the Pharbang Jehanguiri and other authors, the king of Persia clothed in white robes, descended from his throne, and seating himself on a white carpet, the seraperde (or veil before the royal throne) was thrown open, and all his subjects were admitted to his presence. The husbandmen were treated with particular respect, some of their chiefs dining at the same table with their sovereign, when he addressed them in the following strain: "I am one of you; my subsistence and that of my people rests on the labour of your hands; the succession of the race of man depends upon the plough; without you we cannot exist: but your dependence upon me is reciprocal; we ought therefore to be brothers, and to live in perpetual harmony."

The other eighteen days (together with the five embolisms) which were not placed under the guardianship of the angels of the month, were supposed, as before observed, to be superintended by angels of an inferior rank (the first excepted, which was dedicated to Ormuzd, who however in this light was not considered as Omnipotence, but only as his representing angel); and all of them were imagined to be fortunate or unfortunate for some particular actions. One day the angels approved of the society of friends, of travelling, fighting, building, sowing, planting, trading, lending money, wearing new clothes, giving alms, saying prayers, presenting petitions, marrying, putting children to school or to professions, with other matters of smaller moment; whilst the next, perhaps, they were supposed to be marked with their highest disapprobation; almost every circumstance of civil and religious duty being thus arranged by precise and positive rules, the omission or transgression of which was conceived to be productive of all the wretchedness to which human nature is subject. From the above outlines, therefore, which contain an epitome of the public as well as private life of the ancient Persians, much may be traced: from their numerous holidays, we can perceive that their religion was very gay and very idle; and that much absurdity was built upon a bottom of some political propriety: whilst it is at the same time necessary to keep in view, that vulgar beliefs are the great key to the genius of a nation, and that the history of human credulity is a necessary gradation to the discovery of human knowledge.
